York told [redacted] that [redacted] had treated her, not [redacted]. [redacted] told York that it didn't matter because [redacted] worked in the same medical group. York was treated frequently by [redacted] and was at his office up to twice a week. During her visits to [redacted] office, she observed that there was a high turnover of staff. There was a lot of gossip associated with the office. York referred to the atmosphere as being like a soap opera or mini-series. York finally changed chiropractors when SAG stopped paying for the visits to [redacted]. York commented that she would not be surprised if [redacted] had manipulated billings to make more money. York observed that [redacted] appeared to be hungry for money, expensive clothes and other fine items.
